INTERESTS & HIGHLIGHTS:

I am an Assistant Professor at the College of Information Studies, University of Maryland. I am interested in comparatively analyzing institutional settings and policy developments for digital risk governance across nations, sectors, and contexts. I aim to test theories of the policy process on digital risk governance frameworks, while utilizing my technical information security experience to complement findings at the policy level with studies on how security & privacy threat actors are institutionalized ‘on the ground.’ I use process-tracing, thematic & inductive analysis, fuzzy set qualitative comparative analysis (fsQCA), and statistical analysis to reach my conclusions.

I hold a background in computer and social sciences, with eight years of experience in leading technical cybersecurity positions from the private sector, The Prime Minister’s Office, and the Israeli Air-Force [Captain]. I was previously a postdoctoral fellow at Cornell Tech’s Digital Life Initiative (DLI), MA Fulbright Scholar at the University of Minnesota and U.S. Congress Research Fellow in Washington DC. I had completed my BA with honors in Computer Science at the Technion – Israel’s Institute of Technology.

I have published peer-reviewed journal articles on U.S. & EU policy processes and institutions that govern cybersecurity, privacy, and national security. I teach about theories of the policy process, public policies for the digital world, information risk management [cybersecurity, privacy, and ethics], and created a class for designing and implementing honeypot technologies to capture the behavior of hackers.
